What do the Vaux's Swift, Brant, Olive-sided Flycatcher and Fork-tailed Storm-Petrel have in common? These bird species and seventy others have the distinction of being included in a new book of bird species of conservation concern in California. The newly published California Bird Species of Special Concern: A Ranked Assessment of Species, Subspecies, and Distinct Populations of Birds of Immediate Conservation Concern in California, is a collaborative project of the California Department of Fish and Game (CDFG), PRBO Conservation Science, and Western Field Ornithologists. Within the 450 pages of the book, the authors provide a detailed analysis of the status of California's at-risk birds using the latest data to describe current populations, ranges, and threats. Seabirds, raptors, shorebirds, waterfowl, and perching birds all are represented on the list, suggesting that conservation concern spans the length and breadth of the state, from its offshore waters to the higher mountains.

The book, the first full-length assessment of all of California's sensitive species, includes detailed species accounts and up-to-date range maps and will be of value to every field ornithologist, conservationist, wildlife biologist, biological consulting company, and planner in California.
